

Piloting Your Aviation Resume

Writing a resume for an aviation position is not as intimidating as it sounds. However, to write one worthy of a great position, you must put in ample time and effort. Research the company you are applying to and tailor your resume to be relevant to the position you desire. Provide detailed information about your capacity as a pilot, like including specific flight times and aircrafts you've flown. Keeping all of your information relevant is the most important thing you can do to ensure a well-organized resume that will get you noticed.

When you are drafting an industry specific resume for an aviation job, there are a lot of different considerations to make. Your resume should be as strong and as positive as it can possibly be, because if your resume is incomplete, potential employers will get the impression that you're not serious about getting the job. In order to create a great aviation resume, consider the following tips and guidelines.

Many job hunters in the aviation field are needlessly intimidated when they consider the prospect of writing a resume. A resume is simply designed to be a summary of your experience, history and transferable qualifications and skills. Your resume should be able to provide enough information to interest potential employers, but it should not be inundated with any irrelevant details simply for the sake of including everything. Before you put your pen to the paper, you need to think about what it is you have accomplished in your career up to now as well as where you intend to head and how you want to be represented in the process.

- The primary focus of your aviation industry specific resume is to create a complete verbal picture of who you are, giving potential employers a chance to visualize your potential. Your resume should use language that is clear and easy to understand. Here is some vital information on how to achieve this.
- Before you write your industry specific resume for an aviation job, determine your job search objectives. You can then structure the content of your resume around that objective. If you do not have something to focus on, your resume will appear unfocused and cluttered to those who read it.
- Think of your resume as a way to market yourself. Your resume is one of the best marketing tools you have when it comes to getting an aviation job. What are your best features and the best benefits you bring to the table? What makes you unique compared to the other applicants? Make sure all of this information is conveyed in your aviation job resume.

Remember that the purpose of your resume is to obtain an interview, not a job. You should not be going into detail about everything, just providing enough information to generate enough interest. You can use your interview to go more in depth with your qualifications and accomplishments.

Here are some tips for crafting an industry specific resume for an aviation job:

Take the time to find out about each employer you intend to apply for a job with, and custom tailor your aviation resume to suit the individual company in question. For example, what specific experience or skills does a corporate pilot position require? If the employer is hiring charter pilot positions, or corporate pilot positions, make sure you are tailoring your resume with the experience, background, and other details that specifically suit the job that you are applying for.

Make sure to log your flight time in a way that your potential employers can easily read and understand. Make sure not only to log your flight time, but also what types of airplanes and other aircraft you've flown and whether your flight time is logged in the morning, evening, or night time.

If you are fresh out of training or schooling, your education should come first on your resume, as this will be your strength. If on the other hand you have more experience than education, make sure your experience comes first in your resume. Experience and skills that are most recent and most relevant should be what you highlight to catch the eyes of potential employers.

When your focus is to create a resume to get an aviation job, you really need to focus on tailoring your resume to three different things: First, your resume should be specific to the qualifications and experience that matches the industry. Secondly, your resume should be specific to the employer you are hoping to apply for, which means every application should have its very own unique resume. Finally, you should custom tailor your aviation resume to the specific job you are applying for, because by gearing your skills and qualifications toward what the job actually requires, you will best be able to attract the attention of potential employers.